

Testimony - June 2018

Protecting NYC Students from Poorly Performing For-Profit Colleges

In this testimony before the NYC Department of Consumer Affairs, Matt Chaban, CUF's policy director, details how many for-profit colleges in the state leave students with a little education and huge debts they struggle to repay because they did not receive the education they were promised.

by Tom Hilliard & Matt A.V. Chaban

Testimony of Tom Hilliard, Senior Fellow for Economic Opportunity

& Matt A.V. Chaban, Policy Director and Fisher Fellow

at the NYC Department of Consumer Affairs' "Speak Up, Speak Out" Student Dept Forum

June 20, 2018

Good evening Commissioner Salas and fellow panelists. I am Matt Chaban, Policy Director for the Center for an Urban Future, an independent, nonpartisan policy organization based here in the city that is dedicated to increasing economic opportunity and expanding the economy for all New Yorkers.

New York's economy is enjoying record employment. Yet for too many of the city's residents, it remains a struggle to make ends meet. One of the surest ways to get ahead is a college degree, and succeeding in today's economy has become increasingly difficult without some kind of post-secondary credential. There are many options to doing so, and each year, tens of thousands of New Yorkers turn to for-profit colleges to help them earn a degree—and a better future.

Unfortunately, far too many for-profit college programs in New York state leave students with mountains of debt and little else to show for it, as the Center revealed in an April study on the relationship between New York State's student loan crisis and the for-profit college sector. In fact, our research found that many graduates earn no more than they would have if they only had a high school diploma. The big difference is that graduates of for-profit schools often take on burdensome debts that they will struggle to pay back on their limited salaries.

Not all for-profit schools leave their students with little education and loads of debt. Some programs rival traditional public and private schools in terms of educational, financial, and professional outcomes. It is incumbent on policymakers such as yourselves to ensure this is the case with all of these schools—not least because many of the students at for-profit colleges can hardly afford to be shortchanged. According to the Center's research, roughly half are the first in their families to attend college, and the vast majority are black or Hispanic.

Every New Yorker has a stake in for-profit schools being fair and effective. Not only will this strengthen the city and state's economy, but students at for-profit schools are not the only ones paying for an inferior degree. So is every taxpayer, since tens of millions of dollars in state aid is paid out to for-profit colleges each year.

Among our findings were:

- Graduates of for-profit colleges face high debt burdens. At nearly two in five for-profit programs of study (38%), student loan repayments totaled more than 8 percent of their annual earnings, placing an enormous burden on these students as they entered the workforce.
- Students are at risk of student loan default because of low post-graduate incomes. At three in four programs of study at for-profit colleges, graduates earned less than $25,000 annually—the same as the average high school wage for New Yorkers in their late twenties. At 9 percent of for-profit programs, graduates earned less than the federal poverty threshold.
- Both for-profit colleges and public colleges have low graduation rates, but students at for-profit colleges are much more likely to take out student loans and struggle to repay them. Eight out of ten (81%) students at for-profit colleges seeking an associate degree take out student loans, compared to fewer than four in ten students at public community colleges (38%). Students who leave for-profit colleges are twice as likely as community college students to take out a loan and then fail to repay even a dollar of that loan after three years (56% vs 21%).
- New York State is subsidizing colleges that exploit their students. The Tuition Assistance Program provides need-based financial aid to low-income students. In 2015, $72 million in TAP funding went to for-profit colleges; $37 million of that total—more than half—went to colleges with at least one program of study that failed the federal “gainful employment” test, which requires that no more than 12 percent of post-graduate income goes to repaying student loans.

Both New York State and New York City should take action to protect students. The city could start by reviving DCA's successful “Know Before You Go” campaign that educated city residents about the danger of choosing colleges that lead to excessive student loan debt.

The city should also address the ways in which it promotes for-profit colleges against the best interests of students. High school guidance counselors, for example, often do not make a distinction between for-profit colleges and other types of colleges when explaining local higher-ed options to students. Similarly, workforce training providers may recommend for-profit colleges to jobseekers looking for marketable skills, failing to appreciate the high debt burden and inconsistent labor market value associated with these colleges. New York City should systematically ensure that people who provide advice and direction for the city are themselves well informed about college options that could expose students to harm.

City officials could also help persuade the state to tighten institutional eligibility for the Tuition Assistance Program to exclude colleges that saddle students with debt they cannot repay.

I look forward to learning more tonight about the lived experience of student loan debt in New York City.

Photo Credit: Time Gouw/Unsplash

RELATED PRESS

Study: More students default on loans at for-profit schools

News Channel 13, December 04, 2018

Scourge of student-loan defaults in Manhattan, Queens

Crain's NY, December 06, 2018

CENTER FOR AN URBAN FUTURE

120 Wall Street, 20th Floor, New York, NY 10005

cuf@nycfuture.org © All Rights Reserved.